

The Stupid NFL

by

Phil Rasmussen

I am not a fan of team sports for many reasons. One major reason is the “crowd” mentality that many teams have. It is also known as herd mentality, mob mentality, pack mentality, and to a lesser degree gang mentality.

In this case crowd mentality is when a member of the team does something, such as kneeling during our National Anthem, which fellow team members adopt. If done often enough, such behavior becomes the norm for that team or sport. This leads us to the second reason why I don’t like team sports.

I have no reason to believe that women team sports don’t fall into this same category. They may or may not but that is not up for discussion from my perspective. When going into the locker room of a men’s team, I am often reminded of what it was like back in the days of the Greek and Roman bath houses. Men and boys would walk around essentially nude. There would be grab-ass playing around. And in these ancient cultures, such activities often led to sexual encounters.

As far back as I can recall (late 1950s) there were always rumors of homosexuality taking place in team locker rooms. In its recent ad a few days ago, the NFL, without realizing it, confirmed the suspensions of many parents and kids that homosexuality did and has existed in team locker rooms.

While the ad went through a litany of adjectives associated with the LGBTQ community, parents will probably become more concerned about their child playing a team sport where machismo or feminism is a large part of the sport culture. Whether in elementary, middle or high school, children should not be subjected to any form of sexuality or sexual preference in the locker room.

Now that we all know of the support that the NFL gives the LGBTQ communities, there is a strong likelihood that parents will direct their children away from team sports and more toward individual sports such as golf, tennis, and track.

One other aspect of this NFL decision is how will the LGBTQ communities relate to the Democrat’s “Critical Race Theory” and similar educational curriculum in our schools?

Are we as a nation, democracy, or republic going the way of the Greek and Roman societies where debauchery became the norm?